This is Grant Morrison with the handcuffs off, unshackled from the Superhero chaingang. Like Alan Moore, Warren Ellis and Neil Gaiman, Morrison never received a University education; like his fellow Brit writers, he possesses an imaginative genius that puts most serious novelists to shame. After penning groundbreaking stories for DC like Arkham Asylum (a psycho-drama with distinct elements of Gothic Horror and painted art that was exquisitely rendered by Dave McKean), Morrison soon became recognized as one of the most exciting of comics innovators, unafraid of scaring readers off with his renowned strangeness on runs of Animal Man and Doom Patrol. When Vertigo emerged in the wake of The Sandman's stunning success, offering mature-reader, creator-owned titles, Morrison was an obvious fit, happy to create his own series, which would explore his many fascinations. It was clear from the start that The Invisibles would be something revolutionary. Its' anti-heroes were anarchist-terrorists, waging a guerrilla war against forces of darkness and order, agents of another universe that sought to infect the world with a virus of conformity and submission. They existed unseen and unnoticed by most of the population, but agents of order were everywhere in the government, the churches, the schools. Surgically altered, their eyes and genitals removed by their masters -- Imposing black-armored nightmares, appearing to be half-insect, half-demon, in particular 'The Grand Archon - The King-Of-All-Tears'. Against the forces of Order and Conformity stood The Invisibles, agents of Chaos, Imagination and Freedom. King Mob was the cool, charismatic leader at the beginning of the story, and he was charged with initiating a new recruit into the Mysteries of the Invisible College.
