This is a good book because it offers readers close to half a dozen different approaches to the book of Job by offering readers different translations and the drawings by Blake. But what is the deeper meaning of Job? The philosopher Maimonides offers an explanation in his Guide of the Perplexed. In 3:10-15, he explains that God does not cause evil. God created the laws of nature which is good for the world as a whole, even though individuals and groups may be hurt. Three events cause harm. People may hurt themselves, as when they unwisely cross streets against incoming traffic. Second, people who focus selfishly on their own interests may harm others, as many nations do when they steal land from indigenous populations. Third, a natural event, such as a hurricane or storm, which is good for the earth, for they cleanse the climate, may kill people. In 3:16-21, he states that once the laws of nature went into effect, God was no longer involved in human affairs. God does not protect people. For the laws of nature are good and require no change. People talk about Divine Providence, but they should understand that this doesn't mean that God is changing the laws of nature for the sake of individuals. God placed the Divine Providence in humans. This is their intelligence. If they use their intelligence, they have a good chance of being safe and succeeding in life. Maimonides follows this explanation of how the world functions with his explanation of Job in 3:22 and 23. God tells Job at the end of the biblical book that it is true that the world is filled with whirlwinds, wild beast, and the like, but this is good for the universe.
